MISCELLANEOUS READING.

WASHINGTON, THE CAPITOL, &c. A writer in the Boston "Irish Miscellany" of the 26th ultimo indulges in the following graphic sketch of scenes and incidents fami liar to our citizens:

"First to the Capitol, of course. A crowd is hurrying in that direction. We may be in time to witness the adjournment of Congress. Do not stop to examine Pennsylvania stenue, the Broadway of the city, though it would give you pleasure to do so, for the world has no street so grand; but, with eyes intent on yonder height, where stands the temple of Freedom, in its unfinished condition appearing like a ruin of old Rome, let us pass right on, through the beautiful garden, now up the steep steps, and now in the Hall of Representatives. Hal you are weary, you are nearly breathless! We have climbed indeed; we are far above every roof of the city; but here the gallery extends its cushioned seats. Rest, rest, and gaze on the glorious architecture around, and on the animated scene below. The light enters only from the ceiling, which is nearly all of glass emblazoned with the coat-of-arms of each State .-Rich colors and gold glow and glitter there; rich colors and gold cast back the glitter from every wall. From every wall the penciled scenes of our noble history and the marble immortals of the Revolution will soon appear, as panels and niches shall reveal the genius of art. This gorgeous hall, though now incomplete, is full of promise of unprecodented beauty. Those who condemn it as gaudy speak too soon. Let them wait the perfected work. This much is at once evident: that it is thoroughly lighted and ventilated, cool in summer and warm in winter, that the members can be seen and heard; and that convenience and luxury are found. Listen now; it requires no effort, nor any to speak. Every word comes to us as distinctly as if we were in our own small parlor. The only effort at this moment is not to hear; for the jubilant Congress sends forth shout after shout, as the announcement is made that 'the House is now adjourned!'-Desks are put in order or disorder; the great red-cushioned chairs are wheeled back; friends are exchanging kind wishes and farewells;
